

Copula models combining groups of variables

Harry Joe, University of British Columbia, Canada

When there are a large number of variables, and the variables can be divided into groups, one can consider copula models that use the group information. Several methods based on various conditional independence assumptions can be used to construct such models. Computing techniques for estimation will be presented and applications will be mentioned.